March 7th: At Sea

March 8th: Isla de Coiba, Panama

The crumbling cells and overgrown graves are all that remain of the former penal colony that once inhabited Isla de Coiba. Because of its unsavory history, few people came here and almost 80 percent of the island's 124 thousand acres are still virgin forest, where howler monkeys, crested eagles and scarlet macaws roam freely through the jungle canopy. Today, divers, snorkelers and surfers have made Coiba's Bahia Damas Reef a premier diving destination because of the amazing marine life including turtles, manta rays, sharks, dolphins and whales.

March 9th: Gulfito, Costa Rica

The Central American headquarters of the United Fruit Company until the 1980's, Gulfito today is a new destination for outdoor adventurers and nature lovers – both on land and in water. Within howling distance is Piedras Blanca National Park, where white nosed capuchin and howler monkeys, toucans and scarlet macaws screech in the treetops and rare jaguars stalk their prey. And just across from the untrod beaches of Golfo Dulce lies another natural treasure, Corcovado National Park.

March 10th: Isla del Cano, Costa Rica (am)

Nobody knows why pre-Columbian Indians chose Cano Island as a burial ground. If you hike up the trail from the beach, you'll see where archeologists have found stone balls (bolas), mortars, pestles and other ancient tools scattered in various gravesites in the rain forest – and you may run across the occasional harmless boa constrictor! Located about 9 miles West of the Osa Peninsula in Drake Bay, Cano is also a favored diving spot, with an interesting cave dive.

March 11th: Drake Bay, Costa Rica (am), Costa Rica

When Francis Drake sailed into Drake Bay in 1579, he was amazed by its tranquil beauty. Today's visitors will be equally moved. Drake Bay is close to Corcovado National Park, one of the wildest, wettest and most wondrous jungles habitats on earth. With eight different habitats, 400 bird species, more than 100 reptiles and amphibians and 10 percent of all the mammals on earth, it's a tropical Noah's Ark. Also near Drake Bay is the smaller Marenco Biological Station, where you may hike through moss-festooned rain forest replete with toucans, monkeys, curassows and tanagers or ride a horse to the Rio Claro for a swim.

Quepos, Costa Rica (overnight)

Quepos has long been a favorite R&R destination for sport fishers and eco-adventurers alike. As you wander the one-street village with its enticing eateries and festival atmosphere, you might be reminded of Key West. You'll have a hard time tearing yourself away, but the astonishing beauty of nearby Manuel Antonio National Park will entice you to discover another world – an amazing natural wonderland of colorful flora and fauna, where lush jungle, secluded beaches, and dramatic headlands over curling surf give your camera a real workout. The nearby Rio Naranjo is a magnet for thrill-seeking river rafters.

March 12th: National Reserve of Curu (am) | Isla Tortugas, Costa Rica (pm)

A tall fringe of coconut palms waves a welcome to a landscape of milky white curving beaches boarded by azure seas punctuated by soaring volcanic pinnacles. This is the exquisite little 320-hectare island of Tortuga off Costa Rica's Nicoya Peninsula. You might think you were snorkeling in aquavit, the water is so clear. Giant manta rays, dolphins and the occasional humpback whale are frequent visitors here and the volcanic reef is home to dozens of marine species. Nearby on the Nicoya Peninsula the Curu Wildlife Reserve offers an up-close look at the amazingly diverse marine life of the Curu River mangrove estuary.

March 13th: Puerto Caldera, Costa Rica (am disembarkation)
